Intellectual property is the information that makes it possible for businesses to earn money. Business assets are protected by laws that state that the people who created the property have exclusive rights to use that property – for any purpose, but most often for profit.

A trademark is a symbol or brand that is owned by the person who created it. In the United States, a patent guarantees that an inventor owns the rights to profit made from an invention for 17 years. A copyright means legal and exclusive rights to written material, either published or unpublished.

Intellectual property comprises two branches: industrial property and artistic property. Industrial property refers chiefly to inventions, trademarks, industrial designs and appellations of origin. Patents and copyrights are chiefly for literary, musical, artistic, photographic and audiovisual works. For example, on the back of a compact disc (CD) box, there is (in very small print) information about the patent and copyright for the music on that CD.

Nowadays, there is a great increase in the amount of international business that is conducted around the world. More international business means more complex discussions about intellectual property. More international business creates new challenges for intellectual property experts. WIPO is an organization whose primary purpose is to address this challenge. It is devoted to promoting cooperation with the developing countries. In August 1998, over 170 States were members of WIPO. While in one country there are laws protecting the rights of inventors and artists, there may not be such laws in another country. What may be a violation of intellectual property in one country may not be a violation of intellectual property in another.
